The weather has been quite mixed lately to say the least, so I was fortunate that the day I chose was brighter. It was also the first day of meteorological spring and there was definitely a lighter feel to the day. After parking my car and waiting for some sheep to be herded past me, I set out down a muddy path towards the field where the intersection lies. My phone's GPS helped me locate the exact spot in the field. Looking around, I was wondering how I could make an empty field interesting. I set up my tripod at the intersection point and rotated my camera slowly through 360 degrees. Eventually I decided that the best view was that of some trees in the distance on an incline with clouds and a bit of blue sky overhead.
